

Report on Supply Chain Compliance Volume 2, Number 9. May 16, 2019 PG&E will initiate blackouts this summer, faces SEC probe and other legal actions

By Sascha Matuszak

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company (PG&E), one of California's largest utilities, said it will begin shutting off electricity to high-risk counties during the dry season this year. The blackouts may last up to several days and, according to a California statute, the utility is not on the hook for whatever costs that communities accrue during blackouts (e.g., spoiled food, business slow-downs and generator costs). The blackouts come after one of the worst years on record for wildfires and deaths in California. PG&E is being held responsible for several wildfires due to faulty and unsafe equipment. The company sought bankruptcy information, citing USD 30 billion in potential liabilities.

This document is only available to subscribers. Please log in or purchase access

Purchase Login